

Caleb Turner had just said goodbye to his younger brother Rey and his new wife Lisabeth, whom he had just met for the first time. They were true soulmates. The Turner family, many generations ago, had secretly discovered what his ancestors termed as ‘the soulmate call.’

Caleb’s family learned how to develop one’s soul or one’s mind, will, and emotions in order to sense or find their true soulmate. He had been trained and taught how to listen to his soul and how to call out to his soulmate when he found her. If he found her, he would speak to her soul with his soul.

Caleb spent most of his life not believing in soulmates. He could not believe that there was only one person created for you and that something destined you to find them. He was skeptical, and only having the word of his family was not enough to convince him she existed.

After meeting his brother’s true soulmate, he questioned his beliefs and even considered the possibility that he was wrong. The obvious connection between his brother and his new sister-in-law was undeniable.

“Is there really one person out there that was created just for me? And if that is true, will I ever find her? Could I ever be worthy of someone? Do I have it in me to love, honor, and cherish just one person?” These were the thoughts that plagued Caleb after spending a few days with his brother and new sister-in-law. He knew that what they had was real; it was undeniable to anyone who spent even a few minutes in their presence. They showed him that true soulmates exist, and that ‘the soulmate call’ was genuine and possible. For the first time in his life, Caleb dreamed she was out there somewhere waiting for him to find her.

With his newfound hope and the possibility of what could be, it inspired Caleb to move forward in life with a new commitment towards becoming a man that any woman would be proud to call hers.

In his twenty-three years, he had lived a life of debauchery and unfaithfulness. He treated women as prizes and not as precious or valuable. Caleb listened to his father tell his brother, “You have shown more respect for your soulmate than anyone in this family ever has that I have heard of.” Those words stung Caleb to his core. He, too, wanted his father to speak proudly of him in that same way.

He vowed to keep a distance between himself and all women he didn’t feel a pull towards as he watched his brother go back to Louisiana with his soulmate. He wanted what his brother and his parents had. He considered the possibility that maybe a part of him had always wanted to find her, but fear kept him from allowing himself to believe that anything was possible.

Self-esteem was not a quality Caleb would contribute to himself. Once asked by one of his dates if he would ever cut his hair, his reply was, “Why would I want to do that, when my hair hides my ugly face?”
